Content creators have a host of options when it comes to monetizing their work. Many brands offer at least one avenue for creators to earn revenue, in the form of one-off or long-term collaborations. Social platforms also offer payments to creators, encouraging them to continue producing a strong portfolio of work. Apart from brands and platforms, there are also ways creators can lead the charge themselves by monetizing their personal brand through selling merchandise or even online courses.

In this guide, we’ll review the various methods that creators can leverage to monetize their content with brands.
How Creators Monetize Their Content With Brands

Brand collaborations or sponsored content: A brand pays a content creator to make content that features their product or service. Sometimes, two or more brands will team up to activate creators for content production as a cross-brand collaboration.

Short-term partnerships: Short-term collaborations with either one transaction or just a few touchpoints that occur over the course of several weeks.

Long-term partnerships: The most popular type of partnership with content creators that can last anywhere from a few months to a year and are typically the most effective partnerships. Ambassador programs typically fall into this category.

Affiliate programs: Brands provide custom URLs for influencers to share within their content that typically point to product pages. The creator receives a commission every time a consumer clicks the link and makes a purchase.

Digital storefronts: An online shopping medium where creators either sell their own products and services or a brand’s products via an affiliate program. Sites powered by Shopify or Google’s Qaya are examples of digital storefronts; Amazon also provides storefront programming for their creator partners.

Selling merchandise and professional services: Consumers purchase the creator’s products or services from the creator’s store; typically, this is not associated with a sponsoring brand.

Advertising revenue: This is a revenue stream where creators receive a small commission for ad placements within their content. This is especially popular with YouTube videos and blog content.

Platform-specific creator funds: Creators receive funding from investors if they properly adhere to social media platform guidelines when generating content and posting on that platform. More About Brand Collaborations

As we know, brand collaborations are the most lucrative method for creators to earn revenue and simultaneously provide huge value to brands. In addition to typical collaborations and affiliate programs, many brands also offer ambassador programs and referral programs to help achieve their marketing and business objectives.

Ambassador programs: Brands reactivate top-performing influencers to promote products for longer stints. These programs allow marketers to establish stronger partnerships with content creators who truly believe in their brand while empowering them to build consistent trust with the creators’ audiences.

Referral programs: Brands generate links for referrers, who are not necessarily content creators, to share with their audience and get compensated every time someone clicks and makes a purchase. The “Give $10 to Get $10” program that Eyeconic runs is an example of a referral program that anyone can utilize.
